Introduction

Learning is a lifelong opportunity. Learning experiences may present themselves through formal training classes, conversations with others, reading something interesting, having a sudden insight or thought that causes you to see your world or opportunities in a different light.

We often have great thoughts and insights at the time of the learning experience, but sadly these may be lost when we do not write them down and/or act on them later. This booklet is intended to provide you with the opportunity to document your own learning.

This book enables you to:

- Capture your own learning ideas/insights/questions and intentions for change or improvement in behaviour/approach/communication etc.
- Easily refer to your notes regarding a particular learning experience in order to remind yourself of the issues or thoughts or ideas that particularly impressed you
- Document your own intended next steps for future reference, further research and planned action

How to use this book:

Take it to each training class, seminar and workshop or meeting you attend.

- Use it to capture ideas such as: “Successful meetings require an agreed agenda.” Or capture an action - “Action: search online training options for more courses on successful meetings.”
- Write down any new thoughts or ideas you have following a conversation with a colleague/ supervisor/other person.
- Refer to it often. Note your thoughts on various subjects and actions you planned to take to learn more about a particular topic.
- Use it as a reminder of your own learning through the years and to refresh your memory on various topics you learned about

“Whoever ceases to be a student has never been a student.” -
George Iles
